The effects of gender-related hormones on seed viability in Haliclona kyushuensis and H. diversa. Haliclona kyushuensis and H. diversa are two very commonly cultured species of the genus Haliclona, which are generally used as the model organisms for investigating gametogenesis, fertilization, and parthenogenesis. Previous studies reported that the reproduction of these two species is highly controlled by sex-related hormones. In the present study, the effects of three sex-related hormones, E2, testosterone (T), and progesterone (P) on seed viability in Haliclona kyushuensis and H. diversa were examined. Results showed that the three hormones influenced the seed germination rates of these two species in different ways. The addition of E2, which is the main egg hormone in both species, could increase the germination rates of H. kyushuensis seeds, but decreased the germination rates of H. diversa seeds. T, which is the main male hormone, also could significantly increase the germination rate of H. kyushuensis seeds, but had no significant effect on H. diversa seeds. P, which is the main female hormone, could inhibit the germination of both H. kyushuensis and H. diversa seeds. Furthermore, the germination rates of H. diversa seeds incubated with E2, T, and P were higher than those of H. diversa seeds under the constant conditions. In conclusion, our study highlights the function of sex-related hormones on H. kyushuensis and H. diversa seeds.
