RFFlow v5.01 (x86. x64) - A Tool For Realistically Modeling RF Drives.The present invention relates to methods for transforming both fungal and bacterial cells at the nucleotide level using homologous recombination and further relates to targeting a heterologous construct to a specific chromosomal location using the resultant transformants. In particular, the invention relates to methods for effecting targeted genome alterations in a variety of gram-positive and gram-negative eubacteria using homologous recombination with nucleic acid constructs wherein the construct comprises an origin of transfer. Homologous recombination is the process by which genetic information from one strand of a DNA duplex is transferred to an identical sequence in a sister duplex. Genetic information is defined as a sequence of nucleotides that has meaning to an organism. Although homologous recombination can occur between identical DNA sequences, the process is most commonly described by the following model: The DNA is first cleaved by a restriction enzyme into two single-stranded DNA pieces which then flank a region known as the homology. Annealed to each other these two duplexes serve as substrates for a recombination reaction catalyzed by a gene product encoded by a recombination gene. This gene product is often a helicase, a polymerase, or both, depending upon the DNA breakage site. Although such recombination events occur
