Skin surface EMG is a rapid, inexpensive and non-invasive method for assessing thermoregulatory and arousal responses, but its relation to cardiovascular responses is not well characterized. In addition, the effect of anticipatory motor activity on EMG responses to thermoregulation is not known. The aim of the present study was to examine the relationship between skin surface EMG responses and cardiovascular responses in thermoregulation. To do this, 10 subjects participated in a thermoregulatory thermal challenge in which EMG activity of four forearm muscles and skin conductance were recorded in response to a trial with and without anticipatory responses. The areas of low and high EMG activity were integrated across three cycles to form positive and negative EMG areas and the change in these areas between the two conditions were compared to changes in cardiac output (Qc) and skin conductance (SC). A clear cardiac modulatory effect on EMG activity was seen with a parallel pattern between changes in Qc and EMG activity in the forearm flexor, quadratus lumborum (QL), bi-spinalis and sternocleidomastoid (Scm). Interestingly the SC activity was not modulated by Qc at the forearm flexors (QF), but a unique motor response to skin temperature at the QL was seen. The positive and negative EMG areas and Qc were not significantly different when examined both for the overall muscle area or when each muscle was evaluated separately. These data suggest that changes in forearm flexor activity do not reflect changes in cardiovascular physiology. This is consistent with a voluntary motor response involving the activation of both hand muscles to ensure that the hand remains in an appropriate position on the testing table.Q: Allowing users to post questions and answers from
