For example, a user may communicate via a computer, via a mobile device, via a television, and so on. This offers a great flexibility in what a user can do. For example, a user may switch from using computer to mobile device to television. Existing technology has the capability for the user to initiate or select the service they want to use. For example, on a mobile device, there are various commands available for a user to initiate service and, also, there may be multiple service providers. However, it is limited as to what the user wants to use. As a user initiates service or uses a service, a particular user may move across multiple networks. For example, a user in an area covered by a first service provider may initiate a service from a mobile device. However, as the user moves out of the range of the first service provider, a second service provider may provide coverage. If the second service provider does not provide a service of the first service provider, the user must initiate the communication with the first service provider again. As the user moves away from the first network, the user may be required to re-initiate service on the first service provider. This can be a problem if the user did not initiate service on the first service provider while in the first network. In such a case, the user needs to repeat the process of initiating service. Some technology exists for a user to request alternative services. This is used when the user is roaming and is in an area where the first service provider does not provide communication services. For example, in the industry, this is known as roaming. However, current technology does not allow a user to request for communication services with a network in addition to the services previously in use.In computing, a security module provides a layer between a host computing platform and a device such as a storage drive. The security module allows the host computing platform to access the attached device while protecting the integrity of the attached device's data. The security module may perform various functions, such as the device decryption, access logging, and encryption to ensure data integrity. For example, the

History The ministry was established on July 1, 1880. It was separated from the Ministry of Commerce and Agriculture under the Bismarckian reform on January 1, 1891. In 1923 the new Weimar Republic separated the ministry from the Ministry of Commerce, which had a more businesslike interest. After the secession, the ministry was held by the Minister for Social Affairs, Health and Integration. Due to the merger of Bavaria and Austria, the Bavarian
