We like to call this our latest addition to our series of anti-piracy companies. Although it goes by the name of Rovi I believe that there are two other companies that have a far bigger impact on the pirate market than us. They are the Kintai Group and e-Piracy Forum and to be honest we are not sure what is scarier. Rovi, yet again, looks to be a better version of the Kintai Group and then there is e-Piracy, another company that, like Rovi, has a vested interest in the content industries taking control of online piracy in the US market. In this case, however, it is a positive development for their own industry, mainly because it shows their direct aim to eliminate online piracy in the US market. Rovi is the name of a company that found a new way to protect their brands and those of their partners from piracy. The method that they come up with are so called digital watermarks, which are software used to make a copy of a broadcasted piece of media when in the form of an MP4 movie file. Rovi's general aim is to put a watermark on media or a file on a computer that is on a network, and before it's even viewed or shared on a shared network it will be encrypted or watermarked and that way later on when it comes to an online piracy case, it is a lot harder to remove or alter the media. Now, the good thing about the Rovi product is that it isn't more than a 1MB file that has watermarked within it. You won't need to worry about the space it takes up on your hard drive or memory card, it's all contained within it, so if you want to make copies of your media you are not being stopped by this 1MB file. This 1MB file acts as a reference to the original, so if it was to disappear the first time you try to watch it, instead of it not playing back, the software will search and find out where the reference to the first copy of the file is and it will use that information to find its exact location on your hard drive, it won't be able to find this copy of the file, as long as this 1MB file is present on your computer, it will know it is a copy of the original, but it won't know where this copy came from. The bad thing about this application is c6a93da74d
