Falkovideo Safe Mail Net PATCHED

openpgp enables users to send each other encrypted email. unlike other forms of encryption, openpgp allows users to easily decrypt their email at their computers or at the recipient's computer, allowing users to see the contents of their email, and potentially even to alter the contents before sending. this makes it easy to use for secure communication. safe-mail provides a simple web interface to enable users to register, create encrypted email accounts, and send encrypted emails to one another, making it the first service to provide a free anonymous webmail service based on the open standard of openpgp. the service is not technically anonymous. but safe-mail's encryption has allowed it to escape the attention of the fbi and other law enforcement agencies for the time being, while its users remain anonymous. brant explains that safe-mail's encryption is based on the openpgp standard, which, like pretty good privacy (pgp), is a free, open-source encryption program that was developed in 1991 to help organizations exchange information in a secure manner. we asked safe-mail to provide additional details about its business model and encryption technology, as well as whether it has received requests from law enforcement agencies. the company declined to comment, as well as whether it has received any other warrants from the israeli court. its website does not mention warrants, though it briefly mentions a court order from a uk court that forced it to shut down its operations. some of the posters said they had used safe-mail because the site's developer, jonathan levin, was from israel and seemed to have intimate knowledge of the technology. levin was previously involved in the development of the blackphone, which used tor to make secure communications possible.
